Good Governance is a tool to make a corruption free society. It aids the government institutions, private institutions, business enterprises and civil society to conduct their public affairs in a manner promoting rule of law and human rights. Adherence to the principles of participation, transparency and accountability can bring systematic change in administration and are keys to have a progressive society. Ratification of the UN Convention against Corruption by India is a reaffirmation of its commitment to fight against corruption. India has taken vital legal reforms in terms of Right to Information, E-Governance, the office of the Lokayukta and Lokpal which have captured the attention of many activists, academics and policy makers around the world.
