Concept Note

Social Sciences, in the current academic context is undergoing changes in as much as the scope of Social Sciences is expanding, thereby becoming more inter/intra/multi disciplinary. The emergence of new disciplines, including Women Studies, Dalit Studies, Social Exclusion and Inclusive Policy Studies has remarkably increased the expanse of Social Sciences. Mainstream Social Science, for long has subsumed the issues concerning the marginalized communities of the society. Thus the historical; cultural; social and economic issues of the marginalized largely remained in the outer pale of the discipline.

However, the forces of change have enabled the discourses pertaining to the socially marginalized communities to find a place of prominence in the Social Science discipline. The subordinated sections of the society are also insistent on bringing their social, cultural, economic and political issues to the fore of Social Science discourse, in order to assert their identity as also to influence the redistribution of goods and resources. Thus Social Sciences in contemporary times has opened up to critical theoretical engagement with contemporary realities of Dalits and Tribals, women and other marginalized groups.

The Orientation Programme, intended for faculty members and research scholars of Social Sciences, would attempt to delve into the complexities and dynamics of the emerging theories of Social science as well as deliberate upon the facets of Social Science Research.
